Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: .and that Mr. Barrie has not duly correlated his delightful extravagances with the serious notion in the back of his head. The part of Lord Carlton, played by Mr. John Hare, is another example of irrelevance. He is the most prominent male character in the play, and yet he has practically nothing to do with Mr. Barrie's idea. He ought, surely, to be one of the sufferers whom the girl doctor wishes to cure. As it is, he is simply a walking and talking gentleman, who asks her to marry him just before the curtain falls. Mr. Barrie is quite popular enough, quite sufficiently recognised as a sentimentalist, to have omitted that perfunctory touch of sentiment. After the roaring absurdities of the preceding scene, it can have imposed on nobody, and must have jarred on many people. The worst of it is that Lord Carlton might easily be made relevant. If he were the prime glutton in the play, and yet fascinated by the girl doctor, and if in that final scene between them he had to choose between her and happiness on the one hand and dyspeptic plenty on the other, and if, after a desperate heart-struggle, he chose the latter alternative. but I seem to be mistaking collaboration for criticism. Mr. John Hare's quaint and pungent manner was a corrective to his words in that final scene; and throughout the play he was admirable. One watches him with the same pleasure as one has in sipping...
