L. 5: e. was deserted after this period; and, in 1780, an act of parliament was passed to enable Archbishop Cornwallis to alienate the buildings with some adjoining land, in order to erect a new palace on a more elevated and dry situation, as a summer residence for himself and his successors. The premises were then sold, and the palace became degraded to the uses of a manufactory, by which its venerable buildings have been sadly injured and disfigured. The whole pile nearly resembled a college, being composed of various buildings, some constructed of stone and some of brick, arranged round a quadrangular court, of an oblong, irregular plan, about 52 yards wide from east to west, and 72 from north to south. The principal gate was on the north side, oppo-site to the hall, which occupied the centre of the southern range of buildings, in which were the chief apartments. The palace appears to have been anciently surrounded by a moat, the situation being well suited to that mode of fortification, which was seldom neglected where a supply of water could be had. PLATE I. --Tm--: HALL or CROYDON PALACE. The form of this apartment will be best explained by reference to the groundplan, which is given entire, . . . though on a small scale, shewing the plan of the roof, as well as of the walls, windows, porch, and c. The section represents the east end of the hall, together with one of...
